Why is this information important?

Domestic and intimate partner violence affects people from all walks of life, but for those who are formerly incarcerated, unhoused, LGBTQ+, or living at the intersections of these identities, the barriers to safety and support can be even greater. Many have survived systems that failed to protect them, faced discrimination when seeking help, or been denied services because of who they are or what they've been through. Domestic violence resources provide more than emergency shelter. They offer trauma-informed care, advocacy, legal support, and a community that believes your life and safety matter.

For people navigating unstable housing, reentry after incarceration, or rejection from family and support systems, these resources can be a critical lifeline.

Everyone deserves to live without fear. Reaching out for support is not a sign of weakness, but a powerful step toward reclaiming safety, dignity, and healing.
